About the Coquille Indian Tribe

The Coquille Indian Tribe flourished in Oregon's southwestern corner for thousands of years, cherishing the bountiful forests, rivers and beaches of a homeland encompassing more than 750,000 acres. In 1954, Congress declared the Coquille Tribe "terminated." 35 years later the Tribe was formally restored to federal recognition in 1989. Today the Tribe numbers more than 1,100 members and it has regained more than 10,000 acres of ancestral homeland, proudly managing the bulk of it as sustainable forest. The Tribe provides education assistance, health care, elder services and (where needed) housing assistance to its people, while contributing substantially to the surrounding community's economy. Its various enterprises employ approximately 800 people, and its community fund is the region's leading local source of charitable grants.
